Energy drinks have become increasingly popular since the late 1990s. Since then energy drinks have become a part of the social and cultural landscape. During the last decade, scientific interest in the possible harmful effects of energy drinks has grown exponentially. Within the last few years energy drinks have been consumed by people of all ages, including pregnant women and children. They are commonly consumed in large quantities as well as in combination with alcohol. In this paper the short-term health effects of energy drinks, such as ethanol intoxication, rapid heart rate, palpitations, tremors, enhanced perception of stress, difficulties in concentration, increased blood pressure and a decreased mental performance have been presented. This article is based on the available international scientific literature and the experience of the authors. Medline searches were made to identify studies in the English language published in the English language between the years 2000 to 2008.

Clinical studies in humans have shown associations between energy drink consumption and significant elevations in blood pressure and pulse rates. The risks and possible benefits of energy drink consumption need to be re-evaluated. Herbert Croom Herbert Croom (March
