Figure 14-7. Use the Brush tool to paint, spray, apply patterns, and experiment with all sorts of different brushes. You can paint directly into an existing image in a variety of ways: * If you click in an image, you create a new layer and begin painting directly onto that layer's surface. You can then paint any shape or color you like. Or you can create a new shape by drawing the Brush tool over an existing layer. A new layer is automatically created for you, and the selected area is then pushed into the current layer. The newly created layer is hidden so you don't see it, but it's there; it's just not visible. You can turn the visibility of the layer on and off on a layer by layer basis using the Layer Visibility panel. (You can use this panel to change the name, if desired.) * In the other Brush tool controls, you can paint on a path. This technique works like a stencil; you paint a path on an image, and then you can paint on the path with the brush tool. After you've created the path, you can easily fill or outline your image as desired. Here's how you create a path: 1

Hackers are trying to implement a 'Ghost Push' vulnerability that can be used to turn-off infected systems and network adapters. Digital Shadows found an unpatched vulnerability, known as CVE- 2013-1893, that could be exploited by a remote attacker to gain complete control of an affected system. The issue resides in the BroadcastMessage function in the enumeratedn component of the MibsManager. In several versions of Windows, it is possible to use a malicious script or other input data to trigger the MibsManager to send a bogus message intended to change the configuration settings on the network adapter on the system. Ghost Push is a name used by multiple malware families. Trojan-Spy.Win32.FakeSech.2 exploits the vulnerability to turn-off infected systems, and Trojan-Spy.Win32.Moloch will turn off infected network adapters. Several variants of Ghost Push exploit MS07-027 exploit, which was patched during the 7 days of Christmas, while since 5 days in December, the exploit gets much coverage by global security researchers. The Ghost Push vulnerability is spreading at a quicker rate than the known vulnerabilities in the past, with the unique feature of turning off infected systems, it is easy to exploit. "It's not often we notice a vulnerability that can turn off a system," said Danny Anaya,

Nutrient, mineral, and trace metal concentrations in fresh and sold or frozen fish and sea food in Oslo, Norway, in 2005. The aim of this study was to assess the levels of major nutrients, trace elements, and essential elements in fresh and frozen fish and sea food in Oslo, Norway, in 2005. Samples of herring (n=96), salmon (n=94), mackerel (n=41), whitefish (n=39), cod (n=40), skate (n=27), tuna (n=23), and herring roe (n=30) were collected by the local Food Surveillance Department. Fresh fish and sea food were also purchased at local fish markets. We found that average fresh fish and sea food was within the range of values recommended by the Norwegian Directorate of Health; however, with the exception of magnesium and vitamin B(12), average levels of some trace elements were below the levels recommended by international authorities. No systematic differences were detected between fresh and frozen products. In summary, our results demonstrate that different elements may not be adequate biomarkers for assessing the nutritional quality of fish. I've successfully tested my DAO and I'm now trying to write a test for my service. The issue is that this service is injected by Spring with an instance of WorkDao, which is referenced in the service. To setup my test, I want to mock the service, and I need to also mock the WorkDao to ensure that the code I'm testing works as expected. The issue is that if I mock the WorkDao, I won't have access to the injected service. I'm thinking I can create a mock of WorkDao and have it return an instance that will be used by the service to do the work, but I can't seem to get the service dependency to work. Here's my service
